題組 31-34

Have you ever noticed the full moon looks bigger when it's near the horizon than when it's high above? 31. There are, but the question is which one is right.

One of the reasons is the Ebbinghaus illusion (艾賓浩斯錯覺). The idea is that two circles of the same size will look different because they are affected by the size of the things around them. Take a look at the following examples. Here, the two center circles are in fact the same size. From this, maybe the moon looks bigger near the horizon because it's next to small trees, houses, or buildings that are really far away. Then, when the moon is higher up, there is nothing but the moon, so it looks 32.

Another possible reason is the Ponzo illusion (龐索錯覺). The idea behind this is that our brains will tell us something looks larger than it really is when it is closer to the horizon. For example, the two lines in the drawing are the same size, but Line A looks longer because it is nearer to the horizon. In short, the 33. over the real reason for the moon illusion is still going on. As long as you can see the moon in the night sky, it will continue.
