It was once thought that women weren't strong enough to compete in sports. Fortunately, things changed and women were finally allowed.

Ever since she was little, Serena has dreamt of being in and winning the People of Iron Race. Her father told her about his competing in races like that when he was in college. He always tried hard, but he was never lucky enough to win. He said it was difficult because first 1.5 kilometers were run, then 40 kilometers were swum, and finally 10 kilometers were biked. Serena could tell her father loved the sport because he always got excited when he talked about it. Because of that, her mind was made up, and she would compete in the sport to make her father proud.

Last Saturday was Serena's first People of Iron Race, and her father was there to cheer her on. The race got started, and everything was going well for her. Then something happened. She was bumped into during a crowded part of the run and fell. She landed on her knee and hurt it badly. She was told not to move. However, she didn't want to quit when she was almost at the end, so she got up and fought through the pain. Although she didn't win, no one was prouder of her finishing than her father.

Do you know how people celebrate the New Year in different countries? In Korea, women and girls in the past weren't allowed to travel outside the walls around their homes. In order to see what was happening on the other side, they used special boards in their yards. They looked like seesaws, and one person would stand on each end. Each one took turns jumping and sending the other person into the air, so they could see over the walls. Today, it is done for fun during the Korean New Year.

In Denmark, it's a tradition for people to throw their old broken cups, bowls, and plates on the doorsteps of their friends, family members, and neighbors. The bigger the pile, the more the people are liked and the more good luck they will have in the next year.

In Brazil, white clothes are worn to scare away dark, evil spirits; the same is done with bear costumes in Romania. Both are said to bring the wearers good luck, good health, and good fortune.
