Every year, the Oxford Dictionary's editors choose a representative word according to their language researchers in praise of the creativity of English speakers when they face social changes.

These days, everyone uses a smartphone. They take pictures of themselves everywhere they go, and upload them to community websites to share with friends. That was the reason the editors chose the word "selfie" of the year 2013. According to the chief editor, the word "selfie" saw an increase of 170 times in usage over the past year. They were considering including it in the new version of Oxford dictionary.

"Selfie" was seen for the first time in an Australian website in 2002. A man who fell down the steps and injured his face shared his photo online and said sorry about the fuzzy focus, that it was not because he was drunk, but "it was a selfie."
