Brian was terrible at math. Even when the math teacher explained the question the second time, Brian still couldn't understand it. One day, he decided to do one thing on the math exam—cheating. He sat next to Smart. Smart was always at the top of the class in math. He carefully copied Smart's answers onto his own exam paper. At the end of the exam, the teacher collected the papers and graded them.

Then the teacher said, "Well, boys and girls, I've decided to give a prize to the student at the highest grade in math. It's difficult for me to decide which one I should give the prize to because the two students, Brian and Smart, got the same grade."

"Let them share it," one of the other students said. "I've thought about that," the teacher said, "but now I decide to give the prize to Smart."

Brian was angry when he heard this. He stood up and said, "That's not fair. I got the same grade as Smart." "That's true," the teacher said. "However, Smart's answer to the last question was 'I don't know.' Yours was 'I don't, either.'"
